“ My gosh just saw this. Thought a lot of Jason worked at Lexmark International with him. He was an awesome engineer to work for. And a great person I am so sorry for your loss. I thought a lot of Jason!

“ I met Jason when he was transferred to my work group. He seemed to be an introvert at first, not talking much, but saying a lot when he did speak. His intelligence and comprehension of the task he had been assigned to impressed all that were in the group. It wasn't very long before me and my colleagues were truly listening each time he spoke to us about the project. At the same time, we started seeing Jason as more than an engineer and soon a few of us were calling him friend! I will never forget a presentation that he was doing with the Japanese staff on our team. They were shaking their heads and saying no, before he ever got through his proposal for a trial or Design of Experiment that he planned to do. Jason got a crooked grin on his face, while scrunching up his eyes and just ask "Why?" The Japanese staff were not really use to anyone outright questioning them about any decisions regarding this product or process. They ask him to repeat what he said. He again ask, "Why?" He was given confused looks from the staff. He waited a few seconds and said, "Ok, if you have no reason other than fear to say no to this DOE, I am going to proceed as indicated. We will discuss the results when I am finished." He ended his meeting, pick up his laptop and exited the conference room. I developed a tremendous amount of respect for him at that moment, even more than he had already earned. Jason proceeded on with several more DOE's and long story short, we were able to reduce our scrap dollars by 90% as a result of his continuing efforts! Jason not only was good at his job, he was a good family man with Christian values who was humble and tried to live the life he felt would give him the opportunity for eternal reward. He told me that his goal was to make me laugh at least once a day and the whole time we worked together, I don't think he ever fell short of that goal! RIP Jason Gordon. You will be greatly missed, my friend!
